ProblemShared

Re: Head of Growth Marketing

I am writing to apply for the Head of Growth Marketing role at ProblemShared. After 14 years building and scaling a healthcare digital marketing business - and exiting it earlier this year - I am at a deliberate inflection point. I am looking for a role where hard-won commercial skills serve a mission that genuinely matters, and ProblemShared sits at the centre of a category I care about deeply.

Neurodevelopmental conditions have touched myself and my family directly. Watching people I love navigate the long, confusing road to diagnosis - and seeing the difference that proper assessment and support can make - gives me a personal stake in what ProblemShared is building that goes beyond any job description. The gap between need and access in mental health and neurodevelopmental care is not abstract to me.

Professionally, my experience maps closely to what this role demands. Red Castle Services, the healthcare digital marketing agency I founded in 2012, grew to serve 500+ medical practices across the United States before its 7-figure exit in 2026. The work was not conventional B2B marketing - we were designing and running patient-acquisition campaigns on behalf of our clients, operating at the intersection of clinical credibility, regulatory compliance, and performance marketing. In a category where trust is the conversion barrier, brand investment and performance marketing are inseparable - a dynamic I understand ProblemShared faces acutely as it launches its D2C proposition.

I built and managed the full acquisition stack personally - Google Ads, Meta campaigns, SEO architecture, conversion-optimised landing pages, and patient-journey funnels - before scaling through agency partnerships and an in-house team. I have owned CAC, LTV:CAC, and contribution margin as primary measures of effectiveness, not vanity metrics. I have also spent years marketing for mental health practitioners specifically - psychologists and psychiatrists among our client base - where the compliance requirements and the trust-first conversion logic are closest to what ProblemShared will navigate.

The regulated marketing environment described in the job description is not unfamiliar territory. My US experience covers HIPAA, FTC advertising rules, and state medical board standards. I am clear-eyed that UK frameworks - ASA, CAP Code, MHRA, CQC - have their own specifics, and I am committed to getting across them quickly. The underlying discipline of marketing compliantly in a clinical context, without sacrificing commercial effectiveness, is something I have practised for over a decade.

I am also, frankly, at a stage where financial pressure is no longer the primary driver of my decisions. That matters here because it means I am choosing ProblemShared - not taking whatever is available. I want to bring the full weight of what I have built and learned to an organisation doing work that changes people's lives. The D2C launch you are about to execute is exactly the kind of high-stakes, zero-to-one growth challenge I am built for.

I would welcome the opportunity to discuss how my background maps to what you are building. I am available at your convenience.

Yours sincerely,

Richard Girling, Ph.D.
